Introduction

Many newish share traders and investors face a number of hurdles, dilemmas and decisions to make regarding a few things like:

- Why not trade options, warrants or CFDs instead of shares?
- Which stocks should I watch, and add into my watchlist?
- Large or small companies (market capitalisation)?
- How to avoid thinly traded stocks?
- Should I follow the news? or just ignore news?
- Should I subscribe to some newsletters for tips and hints?
- Should I use fundamental analysis at all?

If share traders can be aware of these things, and make a judgement decision about which way they want to go, they can then be in a better position to be in control, and to be on the road to better profitability.

These topics will be covered in this section ST-62xx in the series of Brainy's articles on Share Trading.

Several articles in this group on Trading Strategies are now available, including: ST-6220, "Strategy considerations — volume and liquidity"; and sample strategies based on some well known traders and authors — including Daryl Guppy, Stan Weinstein and Alan Hull. Additional articles on these topics will be written over time. See Brainy's Share Market Toolbox web site Members Area for a list.

Please note: Investing in the share market is somewhat risky, and there is a chance that you can lose all your money, plus more.

These articles on Share Trading do NOT guarantee success, nor do they offer any views about the right and wrong ways to invest.
